Research projects

(1) Urban alliances. The politics between old and new residents (2020-2023)

Urban alliances asks how newcomers and longstanding residents in Brazilian cities, who face facets of the same post/colonial structures of exclusion, have differential access to privilege and citizenship, how they perceive each other, enter into dialogue, and labour to construct alliances at the fractured locuses they occupy. The project grounds in ethnographic fieldwork in cities like Rio de Janeiro (since 2014) and São Paulo (since 2019). The project conceptualises the politicization of newcomers alongside long-term residents in the 21st century as well as the potential and challenges for solidarity among marginalized populations, be they immigrant, Black, Left and/or Queer. All of them clearly face violent realities of intersectional exclusion grounded in the structures of coloniality of which racism, conservatism, and capitalist exploitation are part. Still, newcomers to Latin American cities defend ethical and political positions that may hold a strong potential for tension and conflict within local contexts of political struggle. Whiteness, negritude, gender/sexuality, and political orientation do not necessarily mean the same to Brazilian residents and African or European newcomers. The project will renew the understanding of global asymmetries and how they configure locally in contemporary Brazil. The refined understanding of local politics and societal resilience will be relevant not only to Latin American cities but also cities in other locations in the Global South and in the Global North.

(3) Forum Decolonizing Academia / Co-Teaching / Co-Ensino (2021-2022)

We are an interdisciplinary working group of students and academic staff planning a co-teaching project on decolonization with partner institutions in the Global South. The co-teaching project aims to reveal and contribute to dismantle the interconnectedness of Western universities with persistent postcolonial inequalities in global knowledge production. The project builds on global experiences with digital teaching and plans digital and hybrid teaching formats together with partner institutions.

(4) Valued difference. Assembling social hierarchies in Rio de Janeiro (2017-2020)

Diferença Valorizada. Diversificação cultural e hierarquias sociais no Rio de Janeiro

Valued Difference traces social hierarchies, inequality, and urban change through the hi/stories of arrival of Senegalese (Heil 2020d, 2018) and Spanish (Heil 2020e) in Rio de Janeiro, a metropolitan space that envisioned a bright future before falling back into the current crisis. I enquire into how urban newcomers in Rio de Janeiro experience distinct social mobilities in(to) a locality which is characterized by multiple contradicting and interdependent social hierarchies that are historically shaped by race and class and, in recent years once more, by migration-related diversification. The project contributes to the emergence of a more nuanced, less concerted, and decentralized understanding of cities and social stratification. This conceptualization depends on how urban dwellers interpret, judge, and manage the situations through which they pass in everyday life and which take shape at the intersection of changing global relations and con/diverging social imaginaries (Heil 2020d, 2020e, 2019a, under review a, b). Questions of both situational and institutionalized hierarchisation take centre stage on multiple levels and in various arenas: origin, race, class, sex, gender, education, and legal status. Socio-economic precariousness (Heil 2017) intersects with problem-ridden constellations of black-black distinction (Heil 2020b, 2019c), postcolonial re/deconstructions of power hierarchies (Heil 2020e), and challenges of religious and gendered difference (Heil 2019a). Due to the interferences of unanticipated power configurations, knowledge regimes, public cultures, and sexual epistemologies, urban newcomers live their local incorporation in distinct spaces, shifting encounters, variously configured networks, and their respective temporalities. Different from long-term dwellers, newcomers draw upon conflicting translocal and diachronic reference frames. The project combines participant observation, informal, semi-structured interviews, and transect-walks with online ethnographic approaches to handle its vast geographic and temporal scope. This comparative study results in a 'thick', multi-sited, and multi-layered ethnographic account of valued difference, intersecting hierarchies, and trajectories of inequality.

(5) Comparing conviviality (2009-2020)

My book (Palgrave, 2020) Comparing Conviviality. Living with Difference in Casamance and Catalonia ethnographically develops the concept of conviviality, the ways of living with difference in relative peace in cities, yet well aware that open conflict is a constant potentiality (Heil 2015b). As a conceptual notion, conviviality is set apart from its commonplace English meaning of simply having a good time. Challenging a recurrent ill in migration studies, within which the figure of the migrant is still recurrently othered through victimization or criminalization, my work provides insights into valuable, diasporic knowledges of resilient urban residents with long-standing, transnational experience of living with difference (Heil 2019b). It describes a particularly relevant but overlooked aspect of urban life and directs our focus on the everyday process of how people live together in mundane encounters, of how they re/translate between their differences and how they re/negotiate minimal consensuses. Contested political discourses, encounters in public spaces (Heil 2014b), practices of neighbourliness (Heil 2014a) and the practices of translation and negotiation (Heil 2015b) are key to the analysis of conviviality. As an alternative approach to social integration (Heil/Meissner 2020), my conception of conviviality combines an analysis of social relations, their materialization, and the meanings attached to them. Diversifying and changing societies demand the investigation of the fleeting, the precarious, the uncertain and the unstable. The role of (truncated) multilingualism exemplifies this point (Heil 2015a). Conviviality frames a sociality that is always called into question, at risk to break down and thus continuously re-constituted.

(6) Movements on Hold? A Study of Ethiopian Female Transit Migrants (2016-2020)

Movements on Hold comparatively enquires into the migration trajectories and lived experiences of East and West African women who migrate to Europe, the Middle East, or Latin America. Many are stranded in transit and some have returned to their places of origin. Taking different places of origin in Ethiopia and Senegal into account, the project aims to comprehend the lived experiences of, and challenges faced by Ethiopian and Senegalese female migrants. The risks and challenges they face range from sex trafficking and exploitation, over detention and kidnapping for ransom, to social exclusion and accusations. This project, however, goes beyond a normative victimization narrative and pays particular attention to the women’s agency: the creative strategies they employ while negotiating their precarious and vulnerable position. The project studies the different mechanisms female migrants use to overcome challenges they face and their different pathways of incorporation. Furthermore, we enquire into the prospects of mobility and/or settlement of migrants in a transit country and the factors that affect their decisions to further migrate, settle, or return home. Benefiting from long-term contacts in the field sites, the project is based on qualitative ethnographic methods and life-story interviews. Comparing East and West African migration, transit, and return, we highlight the parallels and differences in the conditions and experiences of two very disparate gendered migration dynamics which sharpen the re/conceptualisation of gendered migration.

(7) Migration and Borders in Times of Heightened Mobility (04/2014 - 05/2017)

Formed by migration to and migration from Europe, constantly growing and changing transnational networks have steadily tied the old continent to other regions of the world. Despite the currency of a fortress-centered rhetoric and practice, people from other continents continue to find their way to Europe; at the same time, because of the continent's recent crisis Europeans also try their luck elsewhere, not seldom in "southern" countries. In this manner, global constellations are continuously altered.

In urban centers, super-diverse configurations have emerged (Vertovec 2007), not only constituted by a multiplicity of individuals with diverse "migration backgrounds" but also by distinction according to a range of factors including legal, social, and economic status. In addition, as a result of the development of transnational communities (Basch, Glick Schiller, Szanton Blanc 1994) and transnational networks and subjectivities (Dahinden 2009), processes of social differentiation can now only be understood transnationally (Berger and Weiß 2008). In this way, both in transnational and local contexts of origin, destination, and transit, complex economic, social, and cultural contradictions and tensions have emerged (Nieswand 2011).

Consequently, present-day migration cannot be considered a marginal societal phenomenon; rather, it is part of a process of social transformation increasingly marked by augmented mobility and circulation. In this framework, interpretive schemas approaching migratory movements in terms of one-dimensional transit (from country A to country B) are no longer adequate. Many people spend long periods in transit or live multi-local lives. These life forms are an immanent element of new, provisional, and fragile social formations, cultures, and economies that, however, endure and presume good social interconnections.

Over time the social, spatial, and temporal dimensions of human relations change. European and non-European societies display characteristics that have emerged not least of all through spatial and social mobility. This calls for correspondingly dynamic theoretical and analytic approaches which we develop on the basis of on-going social and cultural research.

The projects within this field relate to on-going discussions in mobility studies, which deal with the questions of mobility and immobility within all areas of life. They pay attention to the mobility, liquidity and circulation of imaginations, ideas and objects in particular, and of cultures, capital, economies and religions in general. Furthermore, mobility researchers are interested in regimes which try to limit, control or prohibit any kind of mobility. The projects with a focus on the various dimensions of human mobility and its regulation and control systematically seek the comparison with others which explore the (im)mobilities of other objects and themes.

(8) (Un)equal lives of migrants: Comparing, reflecting and embodying processes of social stratification and cultural diversification in Rio de Janeiro today (2014-2017)

Vidas (des)iguais de imigrantes. Comparando, refletindo e incorporando os processos de estratificação social e diversificação cultural na cidade do Rio de Janeiro hoje

This project explores how new migrants into an emergent city of the south, Rio de Janeiro, compare, reflect and embody distinct social mobilities in(to) a locality which is characterised by multiple contradicting and interdependent systems of stratification. The aim is to understand highly stratified urban spaces from multiple perspectives to contribute to a fuller picture of the overall dynamics of current urbanities and the processes of socio-cultural diversification. I argue that we can only understand the social life of a city if we view it from different, but concurrent perspectives. I start by exploring how different city dwellers are situated distinctly within specific urban localities, and which (trans)local reference and value systems they develop to judge and manage their everyday situations.

(9) "Redirections. New migrations from West Africa and Southern Europe into Latin America (2013 - 2014)

This project explores the redirections of global migration flows; the renewed movements of West Africans and Southern Europeans to Rio de Janeiro. I ask how these redirections are organised, which kind of migration infrastructures they rely upon, and what the distinctiveness is of the migrations, depending on their origin, but also upon other factors such as race and class. I explore the social dynamics along the migration process as well as at the new destinations.
